Testing ErrorLevel works for console applications, but as hinted at by dmihailescu, this won't work if you're trying to run a windowed application (e.g. Win32-based) from a command prompt. A windowed application will run in the background, and control will return immediately to the command prompt (most likely with an ErrorLevel of zero to indicate that the process was created successfully).

BEST ANSWER: Although I've used Watco for at least 40 years I rarely use anything other than the natural. Unfortunately the formulation has changed due to EPA requirements and it's just not the same product anymore. In the past I would have said yes to your question and added that you should use wet/dry paper of around 320 or 400 grit to wet sand the oil into the surface.
