There is no documentation (it would appear) and no way of getting it from Canon since you don't have the receipt. I wouldn't rule out buying a new one if this is causing hassle which I think is your only realistic option (or seeing if you know anyone who has one (with receipt) and asking them to do it for you), or buying another for your office, calling support and then you can either use the ...

I'm reading through the manual now of this (bizarre) WLAN/router/ADSL modem combo appliance. Yes, it does appear that you need to find an analog touch-tone phone and plug it into the RJ11 (telephone) port on the device and dial those keys to reset it to factory default if you do not have the password (the manual states that it cannot be recovered without factory reset).

There's no built-in solution. The easiest way is with an array of char* where the enum's int value indexes to a string containing the descriptive name of that enum. If you have a sparse enum (one that doesn't start at 0 or has gaps in the numbering) where some of the int mappings are high enough to make an array-based mapping impractical then you could use a hash table instead.
